

OBJECTION HANDLER

"Can You Show Me a Proof of Funds?"

THE SITUATION

A seller asks you for a proof of funds before signing the contract. This is common, especially with experienced sellers or those who've been burned before. Don't panic — this is a logical question with a logical answer.

WHAT TO SAY

"Absolutely — and great question. I'll have a proof of funds to you during the inspection period, and here's why.

As soon as we go under contract, we start shopping lenders to find the best rate on the financing. Lenders won't underwrite or issue quotes until there's a signed contract in place, so we need that first before they'll move forward. Once we lock in the best option, we get the POF letter directly from that lender and send it right over to you.

And to give you total peace of mind, we can write it right into the contract that a proof of funds will be provided during the inspection period. That way it's not just my word — it's baked into the agreement and you're fully protected."

WHY THIS WORKS

- ◆ Positions you as a sophisticated buyer
You're not dodging the question — you're explaining a strategic financing process.
- ◆ Follows real lending logic
Lenders genuinely require a signed contract before underwriting. This is true and verifiable.
- ◆ Gives the seller contractual protection
Offering to write the POF commitment into the contract removes all risk from the seller's side.
- ◆ Builds trust instead of raising red flags
Transparency about your process makes sellers more comfortable, not less.

PRO TIP

Add this clause to your contract: "Buyer shall provide proof of funds within the inspection period." This one line eliminates the objection entirely for future deals with this seller.
